According to the Birmingham Post, East JPs are likely to request a hearing on the matter. Such a filing would prompt a five-day period for public comments from the ICO. In parallel, JPs in Scotland and Wales are also considering making the same request. This is the first major crypto-related regulatory debate in the UK in a long time. A UK Judge Rules IEOs Are Not ICOs In 2018, the UK ICO was scrapped due to its lack of clarity. Under the terms of this legislation, any organisation offering cryptographic tokens in the UK would need to be registered. However, the new regulatory framework was poorly communicated, and everyone was essentially operating on the same principles without legal certainty. The new regulatory framework was being prepared by the UK Information Commissioners Office (ICO) in the wake of the 2017 ECJ ruling on the subject of ICOs. On September 20, the regulator published its own guidance. The document says that the legal status of ICOs is the same as that of Initial Public Offerings (IPOs). The ICO proposes that this applies to cryptocurrencies issued through an offering. According to the ICO's guidance, an ICO is a capital raising event, usually carried out through a website and blockchain platform. An ICO is a legal sale of a digital asset through a crowd sale, with the token priced at less than 1,000 pounds. If any person fails to follow the steps required by the ICO, they are deemed to be in breach of UK securities law and liable for prosecution. If a group makes an Initial Coin Offering (ICO) of a digital asset without first being authorised as a financial services company in the UK, this is an unauthorised act and is regulated as a financial services product in accordance with the consumer protection laws. An ICO constitutes a sale of a digital asset, and the salesperson is the ICO. ICO participants must be competent consumers of financial
