The world is filled with the scariest and most interesting things, but when it comes to kids, they're usually pretty easily entertained. But maybe your child has a taste of bloodlust. Or they just want to take a break from the same old humdrum nonsense of Minecraft or Cut The Rope. In case you haven't heard of it yet, dragon ball zenkai battle royale is one reason why the internet can still be an enjoyable place for children and adults alike. Boasting with awesome graphics, intense action and a compelling narrative, the game is so awesome that one might want to try it out even if they aren't a fan of the anime. The premise of the game is pretty straightforward: you're Goku and you have to train up so you can be strong enough to face the dangers that await you in the Tournament of Power. The tournament is held on a planet called Jiku and it's awesome that this adds an awesome sense of realism with its unique setting. Of course, we don't really know if such a planet exists but we're okay with taking this awesome game at face value. You'll be training hard on Planet Jiku, all so you can face the likes of Frieza and Cell. The game really makes you feel like Goku because even with your training still incomplete, you can already duke it out against some of the most fearsome opponents. One of the things that the game really does well is that it doesn't just force you to use Goku or Gohan or Vegeta. Instead, you can mix and match characters so you can form your own team of fighters. This is awesome because it lets the player feel more like they're really in the anime. It's arguably because of this focus on freedom that makes dragon ball zenkai battle royale one of the most epic games ever made. With only four members in your team, it's critical that you consider each fighter's unique abilities and attributes to ensure that you maximize the potential of every member. Each character has their own strengths and weaknesses, although some can easily compensate for their weaknesses with their strengths. For instance, Son-Goku is naturally strong since he's a natural-born fighter because of his sheer natural talent. From there, you can use that to your advantage and turn him into an offensive powerhouse who can obliterate opponents on the battlefield. Of course, if defending is your thing, then Vegeta is the perfect character for you. He's got incredible fighting skills and the more control he has over his fighting tactics, the more ruthless he becomes. Also like Goku, Vegeta's got incredible strength so it only makes sense that he could survive even with his massive wounds after landing on Jiku; even if his body deteriorates beyond recognition, you know he'll come back better than ever.
